tion—nothing too drastic, only that when her imagination led away from the main action and into the peripheries she let it. Iris didn't approve, she said their mother's story was important to her and Laurel had no right to embellish, but the doctor had only shrugged when told of the transgression, and said it was the talking that mattered, not so much the truth of what was said. He'd turned to Laurel with a wink: 'You of all people shouldn't be expected to abide by truth, Miss Nicolson.'

Despite his having sided with her, Laurel had resented the assumed collusion. She'd considered pointing out the distinction between performance on stage and deception in life; telling the impertinent doctor with his too-black hair and too-white teeth that in either case truth mattered; but she'd known better than to argue philosophy with a man who carried a golf-stick novelty pen in his shirt pocket.

She moved on to the next page and found, as she always did, the series of her infant self. She narrated swiftly across her early years—baby Laurel sleeping in a crib with stars and fairies painted on the wall above; blinking dourly in her mother's arms; grown some and tottering plumply in the seaside shallows—before reaching the point where reciting ended and remembering began. She turned the page, unleashing the noise and laughter of the others. Was it a coincidence that her own memories were linked so strongly with their arrival, these stepping-stone sisters, tumbling in long grass; waving from the tree-house window; standing in line before Greenacres farmhouse—their home—brushed and pinned, polished and darned for some forgotten outing?

Laurel's nightmares had stopped after her sisters were born. That is, they'd changed. There were no more visits from zombies or monsters or strange men who lived by day in the cupboard; she started dreaming instead that a tidal wave was coming, or the world was ending, or a war had started, and she alone had to keep the younger ones safe. It was one of the things she could most clearly remember her mother saying to her as a girl: 'Take care of your sisters. You're the eldest, don't you let them go.' It hadn't occurred to Laurel back then that her mother might be speaking from experience; that implicit in the warning was her decades-old grief for a younger brother, lost to a bomb in the Second World War. Children could be self-centred like that, especially the happy ones. And the Nicolson children had been happier than most.

'Here we are at Easter. That's Daphne in the highchair, which must make it 1956. Yes, it is. See—Rose has her arm in plaster, her left arm this time. Iris is playing the goat, grinning at the back, but she won't be for long. Do you remember? That's the afternoon she raided the fridge and sucked clean all the crab claws Daddy had brought home from his fishing trip the day before.' It was the only time Laurel had ever seen him really angry. He'd stumbled out after his nap, sun-touched and fancying a bit of sweet crabmeat, and all he'd found in the fridge were hollow shells. She could still picture Iris hiding behind the sofa—the one place their father couldn't reach her with his threats of a tanning (an empty threat, but no less frightening for it)—refusing to come out. Begging whomever would listen to take pity and please, pretty please slide her the copy of Pippi Longstocking. The memory made Laurel fond. She'd forgotten how funny Iris could be when she wasn't so damn busy being cross.

Something slipped from the back of the album and Laurel fetched it up from the floor. It was a photograph she'd never seen before, an old-fashioned black-and-white shot of two young women, their arms linked. They were laughing at her from within its white border, standing together in a room with bunting hanging above them and sunlight streaming in from an unseen window. She turned it over, looking for an annotation, but there was nothing written there except the date: May 1941. How peculiar. Laurel knew the family album inside out and this photograph, these people, did not belong. The door opened and Rose appeared, two mismatched teacups jiggling on their saucers.

Rose set a cup down on the bedside table, squinted briefly at the picture, and then she smiled. 'Oh, yes,' she said. 'It turned up a few months ago at Greenacres—I thought you'd be able to make a place for it in the album. Lovely, isn't she? So special to discover something new of her, especially now.'
